

PHILIPS

Children's Museum

Thomas Haugaard's son, Jakob, explores the friendly forest.

As part of Philips' commitment to give back to our communities, it sponsored the Spring Into the Arts exhibit at the Children's Museum of Atlanta. This private event took place on June 1, 2005 and was exclusive to Philips' employees and their families. It is a fun place for adults and children alike, and everyone of all ages had a great time at this company event.

Philips had a standing relationship with the Children's Museum of Atlanta. The museum's new exhibit, Spring Into the Arts, focuses on using art, light and color in everyday lives. Philips Ambilight TVs were a perfect fit for the exhibit given their innovative lighting technology. The sets were used to display kids and their artwork as well as fun, art focused videos.

More than 80 people came to the event, both employees and their guests. There was fun for everyone, including food, prizes, a caricaturist and a magician. Look at the fun everyone had below!

Anthony Fonzo's daughter, Ariana, put on a dress up show for mom with friend Emma.

Everyone was able to partake in activities around the museum. Here, Kevin Henneberry gets artsy with his two sons while painting on the museum walls.

DeLisa Anderson's two-year old twins Jada and Kennedy enjoy playing with mom in the stream.

Katrina Blauvelt and daughter Evie go grocery shopping while learning in the Fundamentally Food corner.

Several prizes were also given away in a drawing held for the employees. Here are the winners and their prizes:

32" Ambilight TV: Bernice Battle

ShoqBoxes: Jeff Miller and Tara Brown

Personal CD Player: Beverly Pullen

Tickets to the zoo: Lou Ann Thomas and Berecia Brewley-Walker

Tickets to the Botanical Gardens: Charlene Lloyd and April Clemons

Owner: Philips electronic News Last Modified: July 1, 2005